The MOZ-Art Program at-a-Glance

Discover The MOZ-Art Program, an immersive seven-week summer camp designed to ignite the passion for opera in young minds. With a commitment to excellence, the program offers more than 200 hours of comprehensive instruction, allowing students aged 9 through 17 to delve into the world of full operatic performance.

At the heart of this transformative experience lies a full operatic production, the last of which was "Frau Haydn in Trouble," a recently composed comic opera tailored for youthful voices (2023). Crafted with singable lines for children, this opera not only serves as a platform for performance but also as an educational journey into the intricate facets of a production. From the original text to the libretto, the work of the composer, director, conductor, and lighting designer, participants are immersed in every aspect of the creative process.

Guided by accomplished teaching artists, students receive rigorous instruction in singing, musicianship, diction, audition techniques, and elements of acting, while guests share invaluable insights on study techniques, auditioning, career planning, performance anxiety, and vocal hygiene. This comprehensive approach enables students to grasp the higher-order skills and discipline demanded by a production, emphasizing the collaborative nature of success within a performing arts ensemble.

Aligned with the National Standards for Arts Education, this enriching arts integration project focuses on skills such as "understanding and applying techniques and processes," "applying knowledge of structures and functions," and "making connections among different disciplines." Participants not only watch exemplary performances but also engage in critical assessments of their own work, fostering a reflective mindset, goal setting, and the development of lifelong learning habits.

Beyond artistic development, the MOZ-Art Program prioritizes social-emotional growth through carefully curated classes, coaching sessions, and mentorship programs. Teachers diligently monitor both technical and emotional progress, maintaining open lines of communication with parents through constant updates from the camp director and faculty. This holistic approach ensures that participants not only excel in their artistic endeavors but also develop into well-rounded individuals poised for success in both the arts and in life.

Educational Approach

The MOZ-Art program reflects the mission of The Opera Atelier to advance the art of opera through performance and education. The organization provides an inclusive creative platform where audiences and artists of different generations inspire each other.

The atelier serves as the sanctum of an artist, a space where a master artist alongside a collective of assistants, students, and apprentices collaboratively engage in the creation of art, their efforts guided by the wisdom, expertise, and fervor of a mentor who possesses a profound understanding and unwavering passion for the realm of artistic expression.

Within the model of the Renaissance Atelier, the craft is learned through completing progressively more complex tasks. Tasks are planned according to complementary topics in a holistic way and adapted to age and level. Students are encouraged to construct meaning through engaging with the materials within the spiral curriculum. Learning modalities and approaches alternate so that all students can grasp the knowledge and skills. Our educational approach is constructivist rather than prescriptive. The Socratic method, the pedagogical contributions of Piaget and Freire, the theory of multiple intelligences, and the ideas of universal design are some of the principles underpinning our educational practices. From Lacanian psychoanalytic theory, we have adopted the idea of desire as the motivator, i.e., we will learn that which we desire to learn. No amount of conscription will accomplish the desired result without the volition of the individual student- something sometimes left out in the “one size fits all” educational approaches. Educational activities within the MOZ-Art Program are informed by the National and Florida standards of learning, with connections to other disciplines, including Math and Sciences, as for instance, in the study of the physical elements of sound.

When tackling scales, the alphabet of musical material, for example, we do not rely on rote memorization. Rather, after students are exposed to a variety of scales from different cultures, the study of western music scales is started, based on their pattern or formula. Students construct scales using educational materials that allow for different representations, going from the concrete to the abstract.

For example, in an activity twelve students each representing a particular note of the chromatic scale, learn to organize themselves in sequences, according to the scale, combining whole and half steps. When students learn to represent scales as mathematical sets, they begin to understand relationships between scales that share many tones, as different from the ones that share fewer tones. This helps in understanding modulations. Only after having mastered the sequence of tones and learning to play them on the piano, does the more abstract representation of writing on the staff and key signatures is arrived at. The study of intervals and the rudiments of harmony are derived from the preliminary study of scales.

Within the music and interpretation studio area of The Opera Atelier, participants work primarily with teaching artists on solid technical, musical, and artistic development according to the highest standards, including the development of the voice, technical aspects, musicianship, interpretation development, diction and declamation applied to the specific repertory. The Singing and Interpretation Studio also counts on the support of professionals from diverse fields who work with youngsters and their parents and guardians to support artistic growth through supplementary disciplines and integrated creativity coaching, always according to the unique requirements of each artist. As students progress through performance workshops and opportunities, they put into practice the skills and techniques that will allow them to pursue their individual artistic goals. Participants also receive private lessons that cover the healthy development of the voice, musicianship, interpretation, study techniques, and repertory.

Through all these elements, The Opera Atelier provides students with the essential elements to grow as musicians and artists.
